The lawsuit filed on Friday accuses Saudi Arabia of funding and providing logistical support for al-Qaida terrorist activities, funded Afghan terrorist training camps, and provided material support for the 9/11 terror attacks on the U.S. The claims are for personal injury and wrongful death; damages are unspecified.

The lawsuit's plaintiffs are hundreds of families of 9/11 victims (135 pages of them, to be exact) against one defendant – the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The lawsuit is the first of its kind, recently authorized by the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act \(JASTA\). Until now, civil lawsuits naming foreign nations as defendants were just about always thrown out of federal because the doctrine of “foreign sovereign immunity” acted as an absolute shield against plaintiffs.

Veterans Say Organizers Concealed Saudi Sponsorship of Their Trip to DC to Lobby for Changes to 9/11 Lawsuit Legislation By Brian P. McGlinchey

Three veterans who were flown to Washington as part of a Saudi-sponsored campaign to lobby for changes to the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act (JASTA) say organizers of the event concealed the Saudi role in the initiative. In exclusive interviews with 28Pages.org, U.S. Marine Corps and Iraq war veterans David Casler, Tim Cord and Dan Cord shed damning new light on a brazen campaign that turns American veterans into unwitting lobbyists for a kingdom accused of aiding the 9/11 attacks and continuing to support extremism well beyond that day.

Saudi Arabia's Southeast Asia Terror Tour

In Southeast Asia specifically, Saudi-funded Wahhabi madrasas dot Malaysia, Indonesia, and to a lesser extent elsewhere fueling extremism that often manifests itself politically against parties and political leaders the West seeks to coerce or replace. In Myanmar, Saudi-funded terrorists are attempting to infiltrate the nation's Rohingya minority, turning the group's persecution into a regional security crisis and a pretext for greater US involvement, including US political and military expansion.

Meet 70 Americans Working for Saudi Arabia Against 9/11 Justice
